

CARRIER PROSPECTS

There are many opportunities in history subject.

1. Teacher:

You can become a history teacher with a BA in history and BEd degree. You may pursue a PhD in order to become a college professor. History teachers play an important role in enhancing the value of the subject and motivating more students to take it up.

2.Historian:

To focus on some of the specific areas of history and their specializations, you can choose to become a historian. Historians play a crucial role in synthesizing the past events and making them significant for the future. A historian finds the preserves of the past and puts them down in writing for further publishing of the material. He/she analyses the written records, artefacts and other evidence to complete their investigation.

3.Archaologist:

An archaeologist has to have sound knowledge of historical facts, human history, and prehistory as well.

Their major role is to excavate the historical sites and analyse them to further maintain the present architectural structures.

After pursuing an undergraduate or a postgraduate degree in archaeology, you become eligible to work on projects and overall to work as an archaeologist. They have to work in different settings, and most of the archaeologists these days prefer to work in cultural resource management (CRM). They could work as administrators or project managers. Archaeologists not only “dig,” but do much more than that. They are responsible for protecting archaeological sites and usually work on historic sites, museums, or archaeological parks.

4. Civil Services:

To work as a respectable post of an officer working for the betterment of the society is a dream of youth out there in every country. You can be one of them if you dedicatedly and sincerely put efforts for the same.

If you get to become an officer like IAS, UPSC in this domain, then having a command over history will also help you build a strong nation altogether. To work for the future, you must know the past.

Thus, the aspirants of Civil Services need to have a good knowledge of history to maintain the records and preserve the culture of a country.

JOB OPPORTUNITIES IN HISTORY

There are many jobs after study of history.

1.Park Ranger:

Park rangers are knowledgeable naturalists and outdoor guides who often have backgrounds in history. If you're seeking careers with a history degree that allow you to work at historical sites by sharing information with patrons, becoming a park ranger might be a good fit for you. As a park ranger, you might oversee the visitor center for a historical site, lead guided tours through a historic building or complex or prepare materials for visitors to consume.

Since county, state and national parks host many of the available positions in this field, park rangers have access to some of the best history degree jobs in government settings. If you'd rather work for a private or public organization, you can find select park ranger jobs at historical non-profits as well.

1.

2.

2. Museum Archivist:

Museums specialize in displaying and interpreting historical artifacts. When you work at a museum, you'll get hands-on experience with art, artifacts and historical documents, no matter which role you decide to pursue. Museum archivists also appraise and research artifacts, and they often take responsibility for storage and preparation as well.

Archivists excel at organization and use databases and classification systems to track important objects and records. Museum curators acquire objects and build collections of artifacts or artwork for their institutions. They design exhibitions for the public or select groups to view, and they may also research or write about historical topics.

3.Writer or Editer:

As you author research papers and historical essays for your degree, you will build skills in conducting research, communicating facts and sharing historical information in an engaging way. Jobs in writing and editing could be a good fit for using your history knowledge and writing skills.

You can become a nonfiction writer who specializes in select historical figures, events or locations, or a novelist who uses the past as inspiration for fictional stories. You can also handle speech writing for politicians and other leaders or pursue content writing for magazines and digital publications. If you excel at conceptualizing stories and perfecting the content that others have written in this field, seeking a career as an editor could be an option as well.

4. Business Consultants:

Business consultants with a specialty in history commonly advise museums, institutions or historical sites. In this type of role, you'll serve as an expert on a specific topic, such as archives and preservation, or a certain time period, such as the prehistoric era or the Civil War.

As a consultant, you'll contract your services on a per-project basis, working for different organizations for weeks, months or years at a time. Since consultants lend their expertise and leadership they have high earning potential. Because many organizations have funding that's too limited for full-time hires but sufficient for project-based contractors, historical consultants may find substantial job growth in the next few years.

5. Journalist:

While many historians write fiction or non-fiction, a history degree can also prepare you for a career as a reporter or journalist. With a degree in history, you'll have a strong understanding of the background of the issues you're covering, which allows you to conduct high-quality investigations.

Although newspapers may be experiencing a decrease in circulation and staff numbers, journalists can still pursue exciting careers in the news industry. Reporters often create investigative content for online and print newspapers, while multimedia journalists often produce video-based stories for news outlets.

Whether you want to pursue full-time or freelance jobs, you can seek out a position as a reporter, correspondent or journalist. Most professionals in this field have a bachelor's degree and relevant experience with writing, reporting and multimedia.

6. History Professor:

History teachers work at every level of the education system, so you could work as a high school teacher in a public or private school or as a history professor in a state or private university.

High school history teachers typically plan lessons, assist students with assignments and administer tests and assignments to assess student progress. History teachers at this level may work with students in large classes or small groups. They may also take responsibility for working with individual students and communicating with parents.

University professors generally give lectures and meet with college students in small groups. They may also take responsibility for advising students about academic progress and goals. Unlike high school teachers, university professors often pursue history-related research and publish their work in addition to their teaching duties. While high school teachers generally need a bachelor's degree, professors typically need a master's degree or a Ph.D. and NET.